2. History

In 1872, the government sent the first Superintendent General Toshiyoshi KAWAJI to Europe to study the police system. He returned the following year and in 1874 established the Tokyo Metropolitan Police Department in the Ministry of Interior. This was the first modern police organization in Japan. Police power, at that time, was held by the national government.

In the process of the democratization of Japan after World War II, under the former Police Act enforced in 1948, the Public Safety Commission system was established. This created a structure consisting of national and municipal police with the aim of ensuring democratic management and decentralization of police power.

The former Police Act had an epochal significance in that it aimed at democratizing the police. However, it had institutional shortcomings such as the existence of a multitude of municipal police forces in parallel with the National Rural Police. This caused several problems such as the inefficiency of police force operations and low cost effectiveness due to the geographical segmentation of police units and the unclear distinction of responsibilities between the municipal police forces and the national government in terms of maintaining public peace and order.

Retaining the good features of the former act and remedying its institutional shortcomings, the former Police Act was amended in its entirety into the present act in 1954. The National Police Agency was established and the present police system was formed.

3. Organizational Structure

The Police Act empowers the national government to establish a central police organization to control and supervise prefectural police forces on matters of national concern. The act also gives each prefecture the authority to carry out police duties to "protect life, person, and property" and "maintain public safety and order" within its jurisdiction. At both the national and prefectural levels, Public Safety Commissions have administrative supervision powers over the police.

A. National Police Structure

The National Public Safety Commission (NPSC) and the National Police Agency (NPA) constitute Japan’s national police organization.

(1) National Public Safety Commission

After World War II, the Public Safety Commission system was established through the reform of the police. The main object of the establishment of this system was to ensure democratic administration and political neutrality of the police under the administrative supervision by the Commission which consists of members representing good sense of the public.